CHILDREN'S COLUMN

The following are some poems written recently by pupils of the sixth grade at Greenwood (Center school).

George Washington
Washington, our president;
George, how we love that name!
His many brave acts and deeds
Have made his name famous
George Washington, so say,
We love you, George, so say,
We love you, George, so say,
We love you, George, so say.

Our Trip West

By Mrs. Agnes Fuller Benson

We had seen Indians all along since entering Oklahoma, but more of them in Arizona. The men still with long hair tied with calico in a tight knob at the back of their heads, and noticeable as much for their tiny hands and feet as for the "pug". We had been coming through a pine country, but had failed to find any nuts, and, but very few pine trees. They were delicious, but very wearing on the patience and jaws. 353 miles; two horses; 21 cars—and we gave up looking for a Maine horse.

The morning of September 16th we reached the first real mountains (the Hualapais) and climbed to Kingman over a road that was stuck (none too securely) in a sandstone and was wholly devoid of railings as it twisted and turned. Here the high altitude and steep grades were in their effects and a small bearing began to voice its protests so that at Oatman we stopped and waited four hours for the needed part to come from Kingman by stage. Oatman is a defunct mining town but very beautiful and the sun was square overhead, most of the buildings were corrugated iron, or at least had iron roofs—we broiled gently and moved the cars from shady spot to shady spot. We left Oatman and rolled out on a desert that was still hotter and had no shade at all.

In the distance we could see the trees along the Colorado, but we seemed to get no nearer. The cats had to be moved from the basket to my lap and three pink tongues (two no larger than the cat's) hung out. Fluffy, with more wisdom than one would believe a northern cat to have, licked her kittens soaking wet and kept them so, letting evaporation do the rest. And so we crept along through arid so hot that twenty-five or thirty miles was all a car could be asked to do, and it boiled at that, and came to the Colorado at Topock, crossed into California and began climbing out of the valley to Needles.

At Needles a stop was made to attend to the car's needs and I took the kittens to a little green place where they stretched out on the damp earth under an oleander (and it was not in a tub, but a healthy tree some five inches in diameter) and cooled off.

Knowing what the next few hundred miles were going to be, we decided to cross the Mojave Desert at night. Tired by the heat, I slept much of the night, but the cats were wide awake and occasionally by Pal when we passed some particularly grotesque Joshua tree or bunch of cacti. But that was before we saw our first view of the desert. We awoke to be sure he was! Several times we had seen an ancient Ford sedan, remarkable for the quantity and variety of household goods it carried on its floor. It passed us at Oatman, then we passed it, and it must have again got driven at Needles. The past middle-aged driver or evidently wished to make the desert run during the night and dozed, crossing the broad white mark in the center of the road and taking off the front wheel of a car going toward Needles.

At a small camp we had a flashlight frantically waving for us to slow down, a bulk looming in the road, a large car with lights still on standing against the farther bank of the wide ditch at our right, and a neat Ford roadster standing on all four wheels farther on in the same ditch. The car whose wheel was torn off had lurched across the road and into the ditch, its several occupants being uninjured save for a scratch on one wrist; the old Ford had turned around (or over) a few times, shed its wheels and all its glass, also much of the household goods, but the driver, his wife, and two fox terrier dogs were uninjured also; the Ford roadster traveling in the same direction as its elder sister was unable to stop and crashed into the ditch, crashing into the wreck, his car turned over once and a half and stood fairly on its wheels with only a few slight dents in a front mudguard to show for its perils. The man and the man was uninjured though he said a bit dizzy. We got to Mojave a little before midnight, dined on chili con carne and feed milk (water in some cases) and went to bed.

In spite of the late hour we went to bed, we were up early the next morning to cross the Tehachapi Mountains before the sun got high. They were equal to, if not more than, the Hualapais, but the road was much better and fastened seemingly more securely to the canyon walls. We passed over the route which a few days later was to be the scene of the terrible cloudburst which tore up miles of railroad, washed away a roadside filling station, and washed two big "mountain hog" locomotives into the canyon, burying one completely. The railroad played tag with us along the way, disappearing into a tunnel and then popping out again. In one place it went into a tunnel, came out higher up, looped back and crossed itself, then went into another tunnel, gaining altitude each time.

Well along in the morning, we came to Bakersfield with its forest of oil derricks and groups of tanks, each with its lightning-rod, not an attractive city. Then a long, rather arid stretch broken by irrigated orchards, and late the little town of Fresno where Pal pointed out the house in which he and his mother, brother and sister used to live, and at last we reached the population of Portland and covering twice the area of that city, being nearly all one and two story buildings, with two or three skyscrapers, and reached our sister's home, our transcontinental journey ended only that we had to run across town later in the day and hunt up a brother's family.

I could go on and tell of our quest up Squaw Valley, around Ansbury, and up Kings River for a home before we found this place on the edge of the Sierra National Forest with its abundance of fish and game, its fine air and good water, "but this" as Kilping would say, "is another story."

NO. WATERFORD—ALBANY LINE

Tame Crow Returned—Visitors and Callers.

This item proves the supposition that the crows return to their old haunts after their sojourn in the South. Arthur Wardwell, grandson of J. A. Kimball, has a tame crow he has had for several years. Last fall he disappeared for the first time. It was thought he had been killed, but a few days ago he came back home. It is supposed from the sunny South, where he had spent the winter with others of the crowd, that he certainly must have been a happy survivor to see him again. Mrs. E. K. Shedd spent two days with her daughter, Mrs. J. E. Brown, and family. June and Don were both home and all enjoyed the visit. The roads are in very bad shape here. Isabel Reed has left the hospital and gone to her home in Lewiston. Robert Hill has his brood and pulp wood all out of the woods. Winfield McAllister is to haul it. Walter Lord has been ill in bed since Friday. Winfield Brown was through here, Tuesday, taking an inventory of stock. E. C. The question to be acted upon at the special meeting is "To see if the town will fix the date when all taxes shall be due and payable, and will vote to charge interest after that date. Also to see if the town will vote to give any discount on taxes and to fix the time and rates for such discount."

MARCH TEMPERATURE

March just passed with a morning average of 18 degrees offered about the usual conditions for variability and wind but lacked the snow and ice of winter's farewell kick-off. Temperature kept close to the ten year average of 17.9 degrees.

Month opened mild but the drop on the 6th to zero was the beginning of ups and downs until the 20th, when spring came into the picture and kept the mercury fairly level. A week of high wind, some low temperature and chimney fires marked time from the 6th until the 13th. As very little snow fell in this section during that period, deep drifts and snowbound conditions were not greatly in evidence.

John Wright, the local weather forecaster, has submitted his readings at 6 a. m. From the record it is evident March is a fussy month, with temperature extremely variable.
